Project Overview

A. Project Description

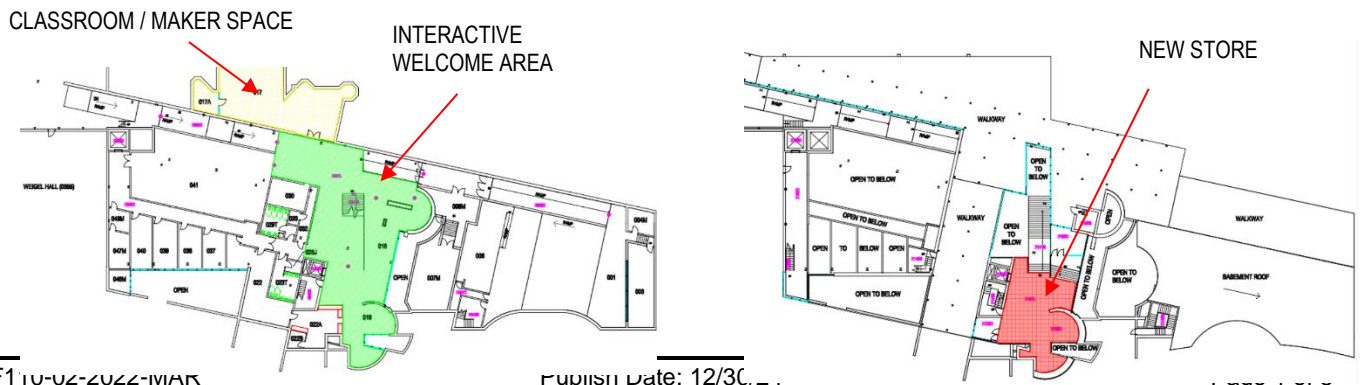

The Wexner Center for the Arts (WCA) at The Ohio State University is embarking on a renovation of select areas within its building. One of the first major public buildings designed by architect Peter Eisenman, the WCA’s complex design deliberately draws on history while invoking the future. This renovation seeks to honor Eisenman’s legacy and vision while adapting the space to better serve the evolving needs of our growing community-focused programs and offerings.

A key component of the project involves relocating the current Store to accommodate a new 1,900-square-foot multifunction classroom and maker space. This versatile area will support artmaking classes, educational programming, community events and multidisciplinary public programs. Planned updates for the space include new lighting, upgraded power, enhanced plumbing for sinks and custom cabinetry installations.

The Store will move to the upstairs lobby near the entrance, creating a vibrant first impression for visitors. The Store will feature a curated selection of artist-commissioned limited editions, innovative designs by local and international creators, WCA-produced catalogues and literature related to our exhibitions, films, performing arts and educational programs. The new 500-square-foot retail space will require updated lighting, shelving, display casework and power upgrades.

Another objective is the reconfiguration or relocation of an interactive welcome area (including the information desk, ticketing and parking services), which will likely be placed within the footprint of the basement level.

Throughout the renovations, every update must uphold the essence and integrity of Peter Eisenman’s original design. The enhancements should align with the center’s values and design language. While experience in art museums, museums, or arts centers is preferred, it is not a requirement
